Sentiments v reality – can ESG really die?

ESG has faced backlash, politicisation and confusion, but is it truly at risk of fading? This provocative session examines the gap between market sentiment and operational reality, exploring whether ESG is truly at risk of fading or simply evolving under pressure. Through insights from investors and sustainability leaders it will assess what these shifts mean for capital allocation, compliance and the broader societal mandate for responsible investment within a private capital context.

10:35

Investing for tomorrow: Will Net Zero remain central?

This session examines whether net zero remains a cornerstone of investor decision-making or whether short-term economic pressures and political sentiment are reshaping priorities. Drawing on perspectives from GPs, LPs, and sustainability leaders, we will explore the trade-offs between immediate financial gains and the long-term costs of climate inaction. How do adaptation expenses compare to the investments required for timely mitigation and what does this mean for the future of sustainable investing?

Innovative finance mechanisms: Tools for unlocking capital for climate and nature – what is working?

Blended finance promises to mobilise private capital into impactful sectors, but is it delivering results and are there other solutions that should be considered? This session critically examines the effectiveness of innovative finance structures, the role of concessional capital and reducing the barriers to scale. We'll explore how government policies, public finance instruments and regulatory frameworks can accelerate innovative finance solutions and crowd in private investment. Hear from practitioners and policy makers on what's working, how companies can take advantage of nascent offerings and what needs to change to better enable tailored mechanisms that align public and private interests.

Do GPs and LPs mean the same thing when they say 'Impact'... and does it matter?

The term "impact" is increasingly used across the private capital landscape, but do GPs and LPs interpret it the same way?

This session will explore how impact is defined, measured, and valued by different stakeholders. Through candid dialogue, we'll examine whether misalignment is creating friction or innovation, and why clarity matters for capital deployment, reporting, and long-term trust.

As impact investing gains momentum and pressure rises to align public funds with sustainability, private capital has an opportunity to support national sustainability goals through targeted impact strategies. Expect insights into how shared language, or deliberate divergence, can shape the future of sustainable investing.
